Our story starts in Berkeley, at the home of Mark and Onyx. Pigletté, BoBo, and UncleMarkie hang out.

The friends prepare a of fresh ahi
tuna with a mango glaze.

No pork at this meal!

Rigletté and BOBO are joined for dinner by Mark Pucci, the famous bass player, and his friend Lia.

Lia takes a real shine to the boys.
Pigletté and BOBO think she's pretty groovy, too.

BOBO and Piglette are popular with everyone at tonight's gathering.
What is with those black balloons?

Oh, dear. It looks like the boys have had a bit too much to drink and are getting a little randy!

Luckily, Pigletté and BOBO have a nice warm bed waiting for them.

Looks comfortable, don't you agree?

The next night, Pat Fell, Librarian to the Stars, pays a visit to Pigletté and BOBO .

Oh, no! Pat is trying to eat BoBo!
She must be Kosher, as she isn't trying to eat Piglette.

Time for Pigletté and BOBO to fly to Hong Kong. It is a 15 hour flight. Maybe they will get some sleep.

The first place Pigletté and BoBo are staying is Rainbow Hong Kong, a community center.

Tommy Jai, the famous political activist, is hosting UncleMarkie, Pigletté, and BoBo. Isn't he sweet?

Pigletté and BOBO stumble across a traditional Hong Kong cafeteria.
Gee—pink, just like all these books!

Later that day, Pigletté and BoBo take a stroll along the shore and see a junk (a Chinese sailing ship).

People fish in this water, though our hosts advise against eating the fish.

Can you see the fishing pole?

Big cruise ships full of tourists dock in Hong Kong Harbour.

Do you think tourists taste good?

Hong Kong comprises an island and chunks of mainland, providing the city with lots of waterfront.

Formerly run by the British, the city uses “odd” transportation, like these double decker trolleys.

The trolleys share the street with double decker buses as well.

But unlike in London, they aren't red.

Hong Kong is vertical;
everyone lives in tall buildings—
some as tall as fifty floors.

This is a photo of Uncle Markie on the tram to the top of Victoria Hill, one of the highest places in Hong Kong.

Here is a shot from the area around the Museum of Art, where Tommy and UncleMarkie saw great Chinese art.

This is the view of Hong Kong
Harbour from the 45 degree-inclined Mount Victoria tram.

The further up the tram we go, the more the fog rolls in over the evening.

Almost like Seattle.

What a lovely sunset from the ferry,
crossing the bay between Hong Kong Island and Kowloon.

BoBo and Piglettés' next crash pad is with Michael. He works for the Asian Wall Street Journal.®

Michael has a lovely place on the 38th floor, overlooking the shipping lanes of Hong Kong.

After seeing the apartment, the boys head to the beach for some sun before Michael has to go to work.

Michael is very tan from his recent vacation in the Philippines. Isn't the view stunning?

Pigletté and BOBO look really pale next to the very tanned and trim Michael.

Pigletté and BOBO take a stroll around the waterfront after Michael leaves for work.

From Michael's 38th floor apartment, Pigletté and BOBO can see all the neighbors in their tall buildings.

Pigletté and BOBO even have a view of the water from the living room.

Tennis, anyone?

From the apartment, Piglette and BoBo wave goodbye to the sun on their last night in Hong Kong.

Even the fishing boats are coming into the Harbour for the evening.

Can you see them?

Slowly the sun sets on Pigletté and BoBo.
The end of the trip is very near.

Prettier and prettier it gets; Pigletté and BOBO think maybe they should have spent more time here.

Bye bye, Mister Sun. It looks like it's time for Pigletté and BOBO to start thinking about dinner.

Look! Uncle Markie brought Pigletté and BOBO sùshi, Diet Coke[®] ' and the Asian Wall Street Journal.[®]

Well—sadly it's time for Pigletté and BoBo to go back in the bag for the long trip home.

Once again in the Red Carpet Club, Pigletté and BOBO have a view of their Boeing 747-400.
